Darryl Barrett is an accomplished health and legal professional with over 30 years' experience in service delivery, public policy, regulatory reform, and programme development. He has advised governments, multilateral agencies, and civil society organizations in more than 72 countries, working across fragile, middle-income, and high-resource settings.

Currently leading the Global Disability Programme at WHO Headquarters in Geneva, Darryl drives the development of policies, advocacy strategies and capacity building to advance health equity for persons with disabilities worldwide. Previously, he led the disability and rehabilitation efforts at the WHO Western Pacific Regional Office and also the health law and ethics unit.

Darryl has designed and managed programmes tackling critical legal, governance, and service delivery challenges – with a focus on marginalized populations – while amplifying the participation of health service users, particularly persons with disabilities. His expertise spans navigating political and operational complexities within UN agencies, government health and human rights institutions, and international development organizations to deliver impact.
